Click to Download.The fate of parasitic protozoa in meat and its influence on the nutritional quality of slaughtered livestock. Parasitic protozoa are dangerous for the host animal and can be transmitted to the consumer. In meat, the risk of infection is particularly high, because meat production contributes to the survival of protozoa. Potential parasites in meat are of particular importance to human and animal health. The present review gives an overview of the epidemiology of parasitic protozoa in livestock. The effect of the number of parasites and the type of protozoan on meat quality is discussed and the possibilities for controlling protozoan parasites are listed. The most important parasitic protozoa in meat are listed, along with the most common control methods.-- title: Character Encoding id: 59386ae5-aefc-4965-b59c-3a5ce2c04c7a challengeType: 1 forumTopicId: 302388 localeTitle: Кодировка символов --- # Description Порядок кодирования для строк и категорий отличается от порядка слов в строках. She has a habit of chewing on my ear, most often my left one. Is there any way to train her not to chew on my ear? I'm happy to pay for any solution if that is possible. A: Cats always have to "play" with something. In a typical scenario it would be a toy for at least a few minutes. If you train it not to play with your ear then there would be a bit of a negative side to that scenario and you would eventually end up with a cat that did not play. The key to avoiding that is to involve your cat in play with a toy at some point before training your ear, and then to have it stop playing with that toy when you begin your training. Depending on your cat's personality it could be a problem or it could be an opportunity
