The report by the Inter-Academy Council on the health impacts of climate change published last summer, warning that climate change would result in more than 150,000 excess winter deaths in Britain by 2020, has been heavily criticised by many commentators. [1] A mass panic that never materialised? The report, based on expert interviews and other evidence and published in March 2007, was correct in assessing that climate change would cause cold, wet winters and droughts and that this would increase the frequency of heatwaves, and cause floods and storms. It was correct to say that a heatwave in 2003 caused 4.9% of excess deaths that year, with much of the death toll in elderly people with chronic illnesses. But its exaggerated estimates of the number of excess deaths by 2020 are to my mind the most important part of the report. Firstly it suggested that heatwaves would cause up to 25,000 excess deaths this year, next year 3,000 more and in the year 2020, a startling 62,000 deaths. Secondly it said that over the course of the decade 2001-2020 as a whole, there would be more than 150,000 deaths (although it understated by half the estimates of another group, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change). Thirdly, it said that these deaths would be mainly in older people. Why does it matter if climate change kills more than 150,000 people in the next decade? Because this is more than the entire population of Bromley in South London. It is more than the population of Chichester in West Sussex. It is more than the population of Portsmouth. According to the Census it is more than the population of York, Swindon and Plymouth. It is more than the population of Nottingham, Coventry, Leicester and Walsall. [2] This is the population of South Suffolk and East Essex. This is the population of Lincoln and Dover. This is the population of Chelmsford and Ilford. Nor is the excess mortality problem of disappearing winter deaths. Contrary to media reports, the impact of climate change on cold weather deaths has not been minor. Whilst warmer air holds less moisture, the lower temperatures can result in hypothermia deaths as the low temperatures increase the risk of sudden death in elderly people, especially
